Happy New Year

A toast to 2009!

It is also the time when police turn a blind eye on places of entertainment operating beyond the stipulated closing times, and become more tolerant of drunken revelers. This is not to suggest though, that violence will be tolerated, too.

For Thais, New Year is a time to also get together with family members and cherish joy and love among one another. It is customary to call on close relatives and exchange greetings and wish them good health and fortune.

The occasion is just as significant to children. It is the time when visiting relatives present the youngsters with what's considered "lucky money". Depending on the affluence of the relative, the tiny envelope contains a sum of money for the kids to buy things they like with.

Meanwhile, on New Year's Eve, practically all the major hotels will hold a gala dinner/dance with special shows and fireworks. Tickets for these events are for sale early on and guest from in and out of the hotel can attend. But New Year parties are not confined to hotels, but also at clubs, restaurant and bars.

As the clock ticks closer to the auspicious hour, everyone gets ready to greet the New Year in their own style at any venue they're at. It is almost party time. Tweepers and whistles in hand, the revelers don party hats. Then at the stroke of midnight, the city erupts with a cacophony of noise. Bands strike up the liveliest of songs. Outside, everyone salutes the New Year.

A few moments later, the clock will tick closer to the new page in history. Merrymakers join hands in friendship and sing songs in unison. All enmity is forgotten and love is in the air. If this could only be every day.
